PREFACE

Following the custom with greater pleasure because I think the appearance of a book improved when opened at a preface, I've concluded—although it may be but too evident writing is not my trade,—to print here a few remarks.

Were I a dweller in this great city I would no doubt be impelled by necessity to greater commercial effort. But living as I do safe in the remotest hills, my wants are few and sufficiently supplied without too great effort. It is not, therefore, a keen desire to sell my work which brings me here.

Very likely its vanity; but, after somewhat more than twenty years of labor, the desire is strong to show my countrymen what I've made in all this time.

Excepting the central porch of St. Bartholomew's Church and two works of less importance, none of my things has been seen in New York.

My statue of Lincoln has appeared to me a sufficient excuse for holding this exhibition. Whatever I know or have learned is in this work: it is useless to look for religious or political meaning in it; there is none there. Simply from the mass of splendid material—masks, casts of his beautiful hands and numerous photographs—I've tried to take what I could use, to the end that I might show in sculpture, something of Lincoln's personal appearance.

My foreword has this virtue, at least, you'll be little fatigued by the reading; and for the rest, enter in and judge for yourselves.
